Another country, full of ideas, full of people, different but the same at the most elemental level, same. Full of beauty, full of heart, full of life, elemental with a touch of another life far away from my own. Haiti, the Jewel of the Caribbean, is where I touched down for a brief period of time. Haiti touched my heart with a different fire, not the heat of summer but the brilliance of cadmium, a spectrum of light not unknown to me but still different. Traveling here and there throughout the country I was enchanted by the beauty of the country and the beauty of the people. A country so steeped in history, so proud of their ancestry, so different in their Haitian manners, their Haitian traditions, and yet the same. The sunlight is fierce, the water is magnificent, the skies are brilliant, like the people of Haiti, forged with strength in their own eyes, in their own lives, walking with their own broad steps through history, with solid determination to be what they need to be, Haitian, forever and throughout.
